

THE GESO VOID

NLRBQ Records Giant Steps

Grad Students deemed "highly skilled workers-in-training" for coffee consumption!!

Soulful decision strikes chord in "G" ...SO!! Today the National Labor Rhythm and Blues Quartet (NLRBQ) answered the big question in the union debate at Yale—Can 6/8 time apply to graduate students?—with a resounding "Doo-Wahh." NLRBQ saxophonist Phil McCracken composed a 48 measure draft indicating that the current status of graduate students was "kind of blue." This recent ruling should have diffident implications for the Yale community, perhaps yielding up to a 57 word article on page 4 of the New Haven Register. While the actual McCracken draft was spackled with very technical legal jargon, a high-ranking GESO member was able to provide the following summary: "Some of us have been feeling pooppy for a long time here and we were wondering if our poopyness was perhaps congruent with a broader poopyness felt by other overly educated, jaded and bored students across the country—in short: does poopyness have a legal basis?"

Free time still a problem for GESO organizers

GESO organizers, reinvigorated by the recent labor ruling, have found it increasingly hard to think about home, school, homeless people, and distant kin. Amidst decreases in seating at local coffee shops, GESO organizers have been forced to "get creative" in rallying support for their cause. "I went door to door along Orange Street elisting the support of local dog-walkers and essentially bothering anyone I could find for about 12 hours...I love it," said one jazzed-up GESO member. While GESO support has remained, what can only be termed "vibrantly stable," top members emphasize that it is the vibrancy of our membership-stability that forms the basis for neighborhood canvassing. "The NLRBQ is playing our tune, why would I even think to finish my dissertation at a time like this? There are so many motivated grad students actively working on their dissertations, well, uh, I just pity their misguided souls," uttered one fatigued, advisor-dodging GESO member from American Studies.

Top GESO members to tour EuroDisney

In what might be called a Mickey-meets-Mitchell meeting, Disney CEO Michael Eisner has invited all top GESO members to EuroDisney, Paris. "Once GESO members see that EuroDisney is just like Disney in the states, I think they will be excited about Disney's long term goals of suppressing the sensible views of others—besides our Lattes here in Paris have just as much kick as Willoughby's," said Eisner. The hyperopic goals of Disney do, in fact, match the criteria of GESO's fidgety agenda. During the tour Eisner alluded that he hopes to instill GESO members with the notion that "it's okay to change things permanently for future individuals and then jump ship." Eisner said he came to these views after overhearing a GESO member exclaim: "Just because all Yale administrators are in cahoots with Satan does not mean that I can't lapse into my solipsistic coffee universe whenever I want!"

Self-appointed hubris on the rise.

In what can only be hailed as a major victory, a recent GESO study showed that GESO members value themselves more highly than you basic Joe-Blow (see Graph). "Our unique ability to over-analyze every aspect of our daily lives should make us all virtually indispensable when it come to employment opportunities regarding the type of people who over-analyze every aspect of our daily lives," declared a nonplussed gnome in the humanities. Later the same gnome added—in referring to the graph below, "Suck on this you Yale Administrator, you!!"
