Helix Therapeutics

DNA Repair for Human Diseases

Helix Therapeutics is a seed-stage company dedicated to establishing cures for genetic diseases using triplex-forming oligonucleotide (TFO) technology. This technology for targeted DNA modifications was discovered in the laboratory of Dr. Peter Glazer of Yale.

Through the use of SBIR grants and seed funding, Helix plans to advance preclinical projects targeting the human globin gene for applications on sickle cell anemia and beta-thalassemia, the CCR5 receptor for the HIV/AIDS population, and genetic mutations responsible for the lysosomal storage disease, Gaucher's. The company envisions that, as advances in human stem cell biology are realized, applications in a broad array of human genetic diseases.

The Yale BioHaven Entrepreneurship Series features presentations designed to showcase regionally developed life science technologies that have progressed along the path to commercialization. Speakers at the BioHaven events represent both the scientific and business side of the enterprises.

The programs focus on key success factors of each company, scientific or technological advantage, business model, and lessons learned in starting and developing the business. The series also provides social networking opportunities for scientists/researchers in the Yale community.

Registration is free, but please RSVP in advance.
